J. Summary of my Activities and Future Plans

My work integrated research, teaching, and clinical practice in the fields of trauma, resilience, psychotherapy and clinical supervision. Since 2025, nine peer-reviewed articles and one book chapter have been published or accepted in international and Hebrew-language journals, and seven manuscripts are currently under review.

My research addresses shared traumatic realities, secondary traumatization among helping professionals, and populations made vulnerable by war and public health crises. Much of this research is conducted in direct partnership with practitioners during and after national emergencies. Two such partnerships are underway: one with the Multidisciplinary Center for the Treatment of Victims of Sexual Assault at Bnai Zion Medical Center, tin collaboration with a colleague from the University of Haifa, examining intervention approaches for survivors of sexual assault; and another with IDF mental health services, examining treatment processes provided to soldiers during the Swords of Iron War.

My research explores social workers, psychotherapists, first responders, and trauma survivors, using qualitative, quantitative, and mixed-methods designs, informed by clinical and psychoanalytic perspectives. I have received internal and national research funding and have led collaborative research teams, including projects on an AI-based psychosocial assessment simulator for BSW training and the ART model of resilience. An ongoing study, through the iPanel research panel with the University of Haifa and a colleague at Tel Hai University, has completed its second wave of data collection, examining public responses to military escalation between Israel and Iran.

In my teaching, I have developed and delivered trauma-informed MSW curricula and received four teaching excellence awards. This year, I am also introducing a new qualitative research seminar on relational trauma. I lecture and provide professional training for practitioners, NGOs, and public agencies. My continued practice as a psychotherapist and clinical supervisor informs both my teaching and research.

My future plans are to:

- Extend current collaborations with military mental health services and community agencies into a sustained research program on treatment processes under prolonged threat.
- Apply for external competitive research funding in Israel and abroad, to support this agenda.
- Continue developing and evaluating AI-based tools for social work education and for practice in complex settings.
- Develop the two-wave panel study into longitudinal research on traumatic stress under prolonged and repeated threat and its long-term effects on practitioners.
- Translate research findings into culturally sensitive, practice-oriented training tools for trauma-informed intervention.
- Supervise graduate students and mentor early-career colleagues working at the intersection of research and clinical practice.

Moving forward, I intend to continue contributing to the academic and social mission of an institution serving Israel's northern region through research, teaching, and practice in trauma-informed social work.
